A human-centered design process is a critical step that is often overlooked when making important decisions in technology for development. In the development space, funding usually comes from a donor or an agency, and the service or products it benefits goes to a different place, local communities in need around the world.

IDEO.org launched as a 501(c)(3) from the global design and innovation firm IDEO in 2011, and like IDEO, we practice human-centered design. In addition to actually making things to improve the lives of people living in poverty, we're working to get the social sector at large to take a human-centered approach to problem solving too.

Bing: Human Centered Design First International
Human-centered design consists of three phases. In the Inspiration Phase you’ll learn directly from the people you’re designing for as you immerse yourself in their lives and come to deeply understand their needs. In the Ideation Phase you’ll make sense of what you learned, identify opportunities for design, and prototype possible solutions.

International development funding mechanisms are mainly donor-driven, and convincing donors to invest in user research, user experience design or iterative prototyping (all important tenets of human-centered design) can be a tough sell. Funding models in development are not ideally set up for iteration, a key component for human-centered design.

Human Centered Design: First International Conference, HCD 2009, Held as Part of HCI International 2009, San Diego, CA, USA, July 19-24,
Framing First, we design the project. We don’t just create artifacts, we create engagements. Every project is intentionally designed to maximize ownership, implementation and impact by engaging end users at the start. We practice appreciative inquiry by positively framing projects in terms of solutions to achieve, rather than problems to fix. We seek out positive deviants—the small number ...
